Feeling the strain

Key points

- Consumer confidence fell 5 points in November to 80.7.
- The proportion of people who believe it is a good time to buy a major household item fell 9 points to -31%.
- Inflation expectations lifted to 5.3%, from 5.0% last month.

The ANZ-Roy Morgan Consumer Confidence Index fell 5 points in November to 80.7, its lowest level since June. Sharp increases in the cost of living and interest rates (not to mention falling house prices) are clearly hurting confidence, but excellent job security and strong wage growth have so far seen spending hold up far better than this level of confidence would normally imply. This dynamic is likely to be on borrowed time.

Turning to the detail:

- Perceptions of current personal financial situations lifted 2 points to -16%.
- A net 0% expect to be better off this time next year, down 4 points.
- A net 31% of households think it's a bad time to buy a major household item, a 9 point deterioration to the lowest level since COVID first hit.
- Perceptions regarding the economic outlook in 12 months' time deteriorated from -39% to -41%. The 5-year-ahead measure fell sharply from +1% to -9%.
- House price inflation expectations fell from 0.5% to 0%. They are negative in Auckland, Wellington and the South Island ex Canterbury.
- CPI inflation expectations rose from 5.0% to 5.3%, breaking a downward trend.
- The proportion of mortgage-paying households who think it's a good time to spend continues to be lower than renters.

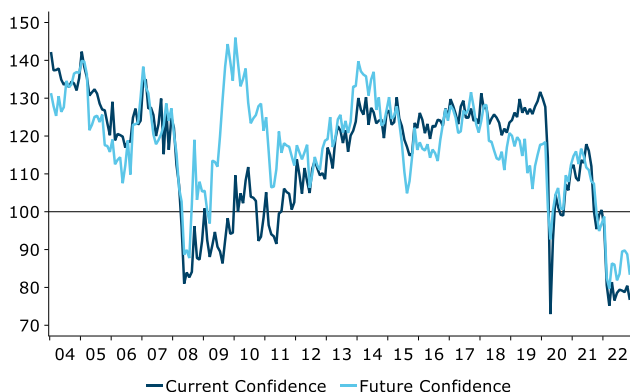

Retail sales data for Q3 will be released later today, but so far, it's fair to say that spending has not dropped away as sharply as reported willingness to buy would suggest it would have by now.

There are significant headwinds for consumer confidence and spending: the rising cost of living, rapidly rising interest rates, and falling house prices, as well as general uncertainty about the economic outlook – clear in this month's survey, where perceptions of the medium-term economic outlook were very weak. But offsetting that, private sector hourly wages are growing rapidly, the employment rate is at record highs, and perceived job security remains excellent. Here and now, most households' cash-flow is okay, and balance sheets are relatively robust.

That said, interest rate increases certainly are biting, as demonstrated by expectations for house price increases petering out completely, and the fact that both overall confidence and the answer to whether it's a good time to buy a major household item are lower amongst households paying off a mortgage. And while the focus has been on those rolling over onto higher mortgage interest rates, rent increases haven't exactly been a walk in the park either.

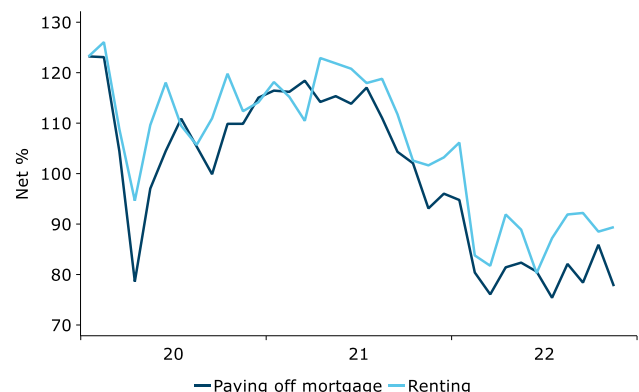

Overall, while consumer spending has been remarkably resilient, we suspect that this dynamic is due to peter out fairly soon as more and more households roll onto sharply higher mortgage rates and the flow-on effects of the ongoing slowing in the housing market become harder to miss. The Reserve Bank will certainly be hoping so.

Consumer inflation expectations lifted from 5% to 5.3% this month, breaking a downward trend, in what will be unwelcome news for the Reserve Bank. Consumers don't set prices, but in a tight labour market they have more wage-bargaining power, which makes their inflation expectations highly pertinent in a world where the RBNZ is seeing unwelcome inflation feedback loops emerge. Further, if consumers expect inflation, it makes it easier for businesses to pass on cost increases, all else equal.

At its Monetary Policy Statement this week the Reserve Bank made it clear that they need to see much lower spending growth in order to bring down persistently high inflation. So far, they've been struggling to get traction with households who have been feeling confident about the income side of the equation. But the RBNZ upped the freak-out factor considerably this week with their forecasts of much higher interest rates, much lower growth, and unemployment reaching 5.7%. The reverberations of that seem likely to show up in the data relatively quickly. Watch this space.
